of all others, breathes the loftiest spirit of patriotism, and is, in fact, the great poet of republican themes.

Above the group is seen the genius of reward floating gracefully, and holding in her outstretched hands three wreaths, the purpose and sentiment of which are obvious. Below sits Poesy, represented by a classic figure with lyre and pen, while on either side are hovering bevies of Cupids, bearing aloft the ponderous inkstand, and numerous volumes upon which are inscribed the names of the poets.

Notwithstanding the many artistic excellencies of the work, in its graceful combinations of line and color, and the exquisite fancies with which it is conceived and executed, its greatest merit consists in remarkable delineations of character as shown in the likenesses of the three poets. These have been pronounced by those amiliar with the originals as without exception the best extant.
